I love that CC allows me to buy an app, open it in the native apps version of Windows and Windows Phone, then open it in OS X version of Photoshop CC with no apparent issues! I've been wanting this functionality for years, so I'm glad they finally added it! Thank you! Awesome update! It's lightning fast, synaptic. Makes much much faster and quicker to do my work. I just had to compare a.tiff file on my iPad and perform a resize and save to achieve the same results as I've been able to do using the desktop app in earlier versions. Wow! I haven't used Adobe apps for years. I had no idea how much I had missed it. How much easier it is to make changes, especially with the smart-preview, the easier it is to make the changes I want. Thank you for taking a chance and making it as easy as possible to change things. THANK YOU!!!!!! The process of lightroom importing can be frustrating. The reasons for import unzipping is described very well there. All the small slip ups in the lightroom import process matter. There are so many out there, which makes your job harder when selecting images to import. But I will tell you what can make the import process much easier. Downside of this is, the you will lose the bulk options in lightroom as they are not saved. If you have your own workflow for complex or sorted images you should transfer this to a LR workflow. Pricing wise LR5 is most definitely a value edition of a size that can easily compete with commercial products. I need help here, as I cannot figure out what the huge gain in speed exactly is in this release. I have an experienced user who is running on non-coinbase Macs, a lot of D800's under the hood and also more than 2k images a day, with or without the latest LR version. She imports no more then 50 images or so a day. And she does it very well. And she can't remember any major speed increase over LR4.3. And it is a plug and play on windows earlier than OS X Lion. It is a pretty good product. But one that should be priced a bit lower.

This type of custom layer system is one of the most powerful functions of the editor and is a key selling point for Photoshop. There aren't any in-app purchases in Photoshop and no subscription or support options. Photoshop, now in its second decade of existence, is one of the best graphic design tools on the market.
